Q.1. Read the following passage and answer the questions that follow it. [6]

Citizens of most countries believe strongly in the rule of law. Laws are written rules that are intended to guide people in their day-to-day lives. Every country has its own set of laws and these laws may be quite different in different places. For example, in the United States, Canada, and many European countries, the law states that people drive on the right side of the road. In England, Japan, New Zealand and other countries, people must drive on the left side of the road. When people break the law, punishments may also differ from place to place. For instance, some countries impose the death penalty for very serious crimes, whereas other countries do not believe in capital punishment. In free and democratic countries, laws are made by elected government representatives. Laws can be made by different levels of government. Laws that everybody in the country must obey are made by the national or federal government. These kinds of laws may relate to serious criminal offenses, federal taxes, passport regulations, immigration, etc. Laws that apply only to the individual state or province are made by the government of that region. These laws may involve highway traffic regulations, provincial or state taxes, rules about education, minimum wages paid by employers, etc. City or municipal laws, often called by-laws, are made by city officials and are relevant only to the local area. Rules that relate to speeding limits within a city, property taxes, parking restrictions, building codes, etc. are included in municipal by-laws. While laws are made by the elected representatives, the police and courts exist to enforce the laws.

1. Give an example of how laws differ from country to country.
2. What is the purpose of laws?
3. What is another term for the death penalty?
4. What is a by-law?
5. Give an example of a by-law.

Film stars and sports persons work hard to achieve something. They are given the tag because they are performers. But there are a number of real heroes who don't get a chance to prove themselves in front of TV cameras. When a bus falls into a river and hundreds of people watch, the real hero is the one who jumps in to save lives. The real heroes are those who serve the nation. Their heroism is something else. They are ready to sacrifice their lives and not expect anything in return. If you can achieve that, you are a hero.
